

My name is Logan Wilson, I am a senior at Independence High School located in Charlotte, North Carolina. I am a full time student, employee, and high school basketball manager. I am currently a member of the Difference Makers program under Communities in Schools. Through this program I'm able to gain insight from different community leaders and mentors on how to create a successful professional life. I have always been a goal oriented, high achiever with a knack for bringing the most value to everything I do. I chose to attend NC A&T because of the direct connections they have to Agriculture. For as long as I can remember agriculture has been a part of my life. From the food I eat, to the clothes on my back, to family traditions, agriculture has had a major impact on who I am today. My family has farmed our land and distributed fresh produce throughout North Carolina for 155 years. We currently operate one of the only black owned produce processing companies in the state. I spend most of my weekends processing vegetables and participating in fresh produce giveaways within local food insecure communities. This year I was honored to participate in a back to school drive hosted by Greensboro Housing Authority and NC A&T where we were able to give away over 5,000 pounds of produce. Getting to experience "Aggie Pride" first hand during this event, solidified my interest in attending this university.
